It was a pitch-dark night, the stars bethemselves into a quartet of sacrilegious excursionists, with a view to securing a freshly buried corpse from a lonely grave-yard just outside the city limits. At the last moment Blanchard had sent word to the others that he would be unable to go with them in the wagonette that had been with them in the wagonette that had been less than the suffer for his rash act.

with them in the wagonette that had been procured, but that he would join them before they reached the graveyard. The three therefore went without him, and drove safely to the place, leaving the horse and wagonette in the shadow of the trees which skirted the graveyard.

Nothing of Blanchard had been seen, and it was concluded that he had been detained. The trio removed the digging implements from the wagonette, found the new-made grave, and went vigorously to work. They dug easily through the loose dirt, and soon reached the coffin, which they opened. From it they lifted the corpse, bore it to the wagonette, and returned for the purpose of refilling the grave. Scarcely had a shovelful of dirt been thrown in before the bod stratchers were startled by the appearance of a fourth figure by their sides.

"We are discovered!" muttered Thornby, under his breath.

"It was a dearly, was a constant reponch to him, and deeply indeed did he suffer for his rash act.

Herbert Green was a trequent visitor, as a friend of her affianced, to kitty, who received him as such graciously; but she was far from returning the tra torous love which he bore for her. One evening he called in the absonce of Thornby.

"Miss Blanchard," he said, after some commonplace conversation, "during the short time that I have known you I have fallen deeply in love with you. I am a novice in love-making, and can make no pretty speeches. Will you be my wife?"

"Yes. I know it; but he can't love you so I do," pleaded Herbert.

"You are a traitor to your friend," said the now indignant Kitty: "and you cought to be ashamed for trying to steal round in which he prizes most in all the world. But John is too noble to suspect you, and if you will promise not to repeat this insult, I will never tell him what you have done."
